Here's what you'll need to create articulation flashcards: sturdy paper, printer, and laminator (optional). Print the file on both sides of the paper, then cut out the cards along the green lines. Laminate each page for extra protection if desired. To identify word types, note the order of consonants and vowels in each word: - CV words: me, key, shoe - VC words: cow, boy, bee - CVC words: moon, hat, goose - CVCV words: baby, bunny, taco For speech activities, sort cards by type (CV, VC, CVC, and CVCV) first. Then follow the directions for the next page. This deck of articulation cards is best suited for children who struggle with simple words due to speech errors or conditions such as apraxia, autism, Down Syndrome, or severe phonological processes. Start with CV and VC word cards by holding up each picture and asking the child "what's this?" Based on their response, move forward in difficulty. 1. Start with simple words like CV and VC if child can't say it. 2. If not, start with consonant-vowel-consonant (CVC) deck 3. Move to consonant-vowel-consonant-vowel (CVCV) deck once child can say CVC words most of the time If child is still having trouble: 1. Choose CVC deck first 2. Practice imitation and then try saying it on own, rewarding for correct usage Make speech practice fun by: 1. Playing games with word cards 2. Using yoga poses or actions during work 3. Giving small rewards like coins or treasures 4. Creating sentence examples using target words Work with your child to develop articulation skills, starting with simple exercises like those found at Articulation Station. Have them demonstrate how to do it, allowing you to correct any mistakes. Make learning fun by hiding words around the house for them to find, recording themselves, and creating a book of their progress. Use visual aids like pictures or word placement on walls to help reinforce learning. If your child struggles, don't be discouraged - adjust your approach as needed. Start with simpler actions or sounds, such as imitating mouth movements, and gradually build up to more complex tasks. Be sure to track progress and offer positive reinforcement, like stickers or small rewards. For additional support, consider the following resources: * Learn about VCCV words, which follow a specific pattern and are perfect for practicing syllabication. * Download printable lists of 83 two-syllable words, organized into easy-to-use categories. * Practice with free vccv syllable division worksheets to help your child build confidence in reading multisyllabic words. Remember, teaching your child to read should be a positive experience - don't be afraid to use fun and engaging methods to make learning enjoyable! Teaching kids to read two-syllable words can start with breaking them down into their phonetic parts. By splitting words like "rabbit" into its syllables (rab-bit), students learn to identify vowels and mark them, then draw a curved line under each syllable, and finally read the word out loud. This process helps kids recognize patterns in words. To take it further, teachers can use lists of words with specific features: List 1 includes words like "happens" where the same consonant is found between vowels, List 2 includes words like "victim" where different consonants are found, List 3 involves words with blends (like "flipflop"), and List 4 covers compound words (such as "sunfish"). These lists help kids progress from basic to more complex reading patterns. For teaching syllabication, use the provided word lists as examples and model marking and reading the words during guided practice. Use a document camera to show kids how to mark and read words in the first column of worksheets. Give each student their own copy to follow along with you during this "We Do" section. After that, have them complete the worksheet on their own as the "I Do" portion, focusing on marking and reading words in the second column. Emphasize the importance of breaking down rabbit words correctly, taking into account blends or digraphs within the word. To aid students, provide a step-by-step procedure for marking words and access resources such as open and closed syllable guidelines or specific VC/CV word division worksheets.
